More Than Meets the Eye?

• Why Bilderberg isn't Nazi & Ron Paul isn't going third party

> "Zionist interests are heavily backing Mitt Romney for president in 2012."

By Michael Collins Piper

*T*hree current news stories — taken together — illustrate that things are not always as they seem. Take, for example, a new revelation about the Bilderberg group released by Internet voice Alex Jones in the wake of last week's Bilderberg meeting in Virginia, where Jones joined a crowd jeering the assembled would-be world rulers.

Although Jones has insisted Bilderberg is some sort of remnant of the Nazi regime of Adolf Hitler devoted to a modern-day Nazi agenda, a report on Jones's own website effectively admits Bilderberg's program is distinctly anti-Nazi.

Citing the papers of former Sen. Fred Harris (D-Okla.), who attended Bilderberg's 1966 meeting in Wiesbaden, Germany, Jones points out that Harris recorded the remarks of top Bilderberg figure, labor leader Walter Reuther, who outlined Bilderberg's underlying agenda: "Nationalism is dangerous."

WWII-era German National Socialism — Nazism — of course, was very much nationalist in every sense, and the fact nationalism was denounced at Bilderberg gives a clear picture of the real Bilderberg point of view, rumors notwithstanding.

Jones mentions Bilderberg's founder, Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, had been a Nazi Party member. But what Jones does not mention is that Bernhard left the party in 1934, a year after Hitler came to power, and by 1940 was a top leader of the anti-Nazi resistance in Europe. So by the time Bernhard became Bilderberg chief, he had undergone a serious political transformation.

What's more, as careful historians know, Hitler held Bernhard in contempt. In his recorded *Table Talk and in the memoirs of his valet, Hitler is recalled scoffing satirically at Bernhard, and questioning his intelligence, integrity and loyalty.

The forces leading Bilderberg are anti-Nazi, particularly the Rothschild dynasty, whose assets were seized by the Nazis, belying a popular myth that "the Nazis never touched the Rothschilds."

JUMPING SHIP

Another news event that's received a buzz in political circles — but the major media isn't telling the entirety of the story — involves a prominent Democrat switching sides to join up with the GOP.

The Republicans are crowing that an early Barack Obama supporter — black former liberal Democratic congressman from Alabama, Artur Davis — has quit the Democrats, gone Republican, endorsed Mitt Romney, and declared his interest in running as a GOP candidate in Virginia.

Since Davis was the first public official outside Obama's home state to endorse Obama for president and who seconded his nomination at the 2008 convention, the media has suggested that Davis's reversal implies danger to Obama's reelection chances. It might. Here's why.

Not mentioned in the press is the origin of Davis's political career and who has pulled his strings. Davis was recruited by Zionist interests in 2002 to challenge incumbent black liberal Democratic Rep. Earl Hilliard (Ala.), who had crossed the pro-Israel lobby. Tons of money from Jewish donors bankrolled Davis and helped him sink Hilliard.

So Davis's journey into GOP ranks is no surprise since hardline Zionists are going Republican, and especially since the GOP's Mitt Romney is a longtime friend of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

ANGRY PAUL SUPPORTERS

Another endorsement of special interest to patriots is that of liberal Republican Romney by Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), son of beloved Rep. Ron Paul (R-Tex.).

Chris Cillizza, the closely read Washington Post pundit, described the endorsement as "intriguing" and noted that it "is more important than it might seem at first glance." The bottom line, he said, is that this will "virtually ensure that there won't be a genuine insurrection led by supporters of [Ron] Paul at the [GOP] convention" and that this is a "very clear signal" by Rand Paul that he's a "good soldier" for the Republicans.

Cillizza finds it unlikely Ron Paul will bolt the GOP and run third party, especially since this would harm his son's future in Republican ranks. And now, as AFP has noted, Rand Paul seems prepared to "rewrite" his father's historic, nationalist foreign policy views as he, Rand, reaches for a future GOP presidential nomination.

Is it any wonder, as Cillizza commented correctly: "Sometimes — actually almost always — in politics there's more than meets the eye."
